BIG DEMOCRATIC GAIN IN VERMONT.

Republicans Lose at Least Thirtythree Seats in the State Legislature.

Democrats Make Almost a Clean Sweep in Arkansas, Where the Populists Poll Less Than 5,000 Ballots.

The September election in Vermont is always one of unusual political significance. The Democratic vote in that State usually remains almost constant, but the Republican cote varies according to the general trend of sentiment throughout the country. When Republicanism is vigorous in the nation Vermont Republicans all go to the polls; when it is weak many of them stay at home. Thus the Republican majority varies, and according as it is comparatively small, moderate or large, there is a Democratic national sweep, a balance of parties or a Republican triumph. Anything under 20,000 is very small in Vermont, and anything over 25,000 is large. In 1896 the Republican plurality was 38.-391 for Governor and 40,490 for President. This year the indications are that it will be only about 22,000, the smallest, with only two exceptions, within the last ticenty years. There are also large Democratic gains in the Legislature.
